ABSTRACT

Information on creative writing programs was collected from 1042 out of 1200 American colleges and universities contacted. The following data is presented in tabular form: (1) undergraduate academic status of creative writing; (2) graduate status; (3) offering of a course or courses covering the "core" or basic literary genres of short story, verse, and playwriting; (4) additional or unique course offerings in creative writing, such as TV, radio, film writing; (5) opportunities for independent study and work/study or experimental programs related to creative writing; (6) professional writers on the faculty; (7) opportunities for contact with professional writers through visits, lecture series or a "Writer in Residence" program; (8) prizes and awards in creative writing; (9) opportunities for individual contact with creative writing faculty in seminars or individual conferences; (10) extra-curricular outlets for practicing and appreciating creative writing. In addition to the general data summary for each school, there are special tables describing special programs in creative writing; specific prizes and awards; and professional writers on school faculties by name. Also, there is a list of schools which do not offer creative writing programs. The survey method employed in this research is presented as a model for research of this type. (Author)

In an extensive project such as this, a large number of people are necessary to carry out and design the various procedures. Mrs. Judith G. Scott is responsible for the original survey of over 200 colleges and universities which determined the basic design of this guide and contributed a good deal of the information contained within it. I would also like to thank the numerous secretaries who carried out the laborious tasks of mailing, typing, collating, and indexing which the later part of this project required. For the later part of the project, I would especially like to thank Mrs. Georgia Goeters who contributed many of her own ideas in the course of transcribing the data, organizing the tables and typing the final manuscript. I, however, assume full responsibility for interpretation of the information received, and the editorship of the final report.

Albert Rothenberg, M.D.

I. Introduction

The information contained in this guide is based on responses to a questionnaire sent to 1200 American Colleges and Universities. All schools contacted are regionally accredited and are listed in the most comprehensive survey of American Colleges and Universities currently available, Comparative Guide to American Colleges, 1968-69 Edition by James Cass and Max Birnbaum (New York: Harper and Row).

An unusually high response of 1042 replies to the questionnaire were received. In order to facilitate the response, self-addressed stamped envelopes had been included with all 1200 inquires, a relatively simple questionnaire form was used and two subsequent mailings were sent out. The first follow-up mailing was sent to clarify mixups in mailing and to gain additional information in doubtful or confusing cases. Also, numerous long distance calls to schools were made for the same purpose. A good deal of additional information was collected as a result of these procedures. The second follow-up mailing consisted of a letter to schools which had not responded at all. These schools were again invited to reply to the questionnaire and informed that lack of response to this final inquiry would be taken as presumptive evidence of absence of any creative writing teaching in the school and would be so indicated in the final report. A small number of schools responded to this last mailing and the data they supplied is included in this guide. The claim to be a comprehensive guide, then, is based on the inclusion of definite information on an unusually extensive number of schools and on the report of negative results, i.e., negative results which provide information of their own.

The ten-question questionnaire was developed from an initial survey carried out by Mrs. Judith G. Scott. Mrs. Scott collected extensive information (through catalogues, mailings and phone calls) on creative writing teaching at over 200 colleges and universities. From this data and from our knowledge of crucial considerations in teaching and literary creativity based on our research experience, we determined that information about ten particular areas would provide a clear picture of a creative writing program; this information could be used to evaluate the effectiveness of any given program. These ten areas are: (1) undergraduate academic status of creative writing as a discipline; (2) graduate status; (3) offering of a course or courses covering the "core" or basic literary genres of short story, verse, and playwrighting; (4) additional or unique course offerings in creative writing; (5) providing opportunities for independent study and work/study or providing experimental programs related to creative writing; (6) providing contact with professional writers on the faculty; (7) providing contact with professional writers through visits, artists' lecture series or a "Writer in Residence" program; (8) offering prizes or awards in creative writing; (9) teaching creative writing through individual contact with the faculty in small seminars or individual conferences; (10) providing outlets for practicing and appreciating creative writing outside the classroom (extra-curricular or non-curricular outlets).

The rationale for focusing on these ten areas will now be briefly discussed along with the specification of the actual questions asked on the questionnaire. The questions were the following:

Question 1: Does your school offer a creative writing major? minor? concentration?

Although it is certainly possible to emphasize creative writing without it having formal academic status in terms of a major, minor, or concentration, positive answers to this question would indicate the school's serious commitment to the field and, presumptively, a fairly large number of courses.

Question 2: Is there graduate work in creative writing? (M.A., M.F.A., or Ph.D.)

Although it may be argued that persons seriously interested in creative writing would benefit from a definite experience with serious scholarship in a particular discipline such as English, Psychology, etc., the provision of graduate work in creative writing allows for continued development of the student's skills and even more than with formal undergraduate status for creative writing, graduate courses and graduate degrees in creative writing indicate the school's serious commitment to the field.

Question 3: Do the courses offered include short story, verse, and playwrighting?

Freedom to choose the type of literary genre in which a young writer functions best seems crucial in helping develop such a personal skill as creative writing. Although schools having faculty who are only skilled in one genre probably do well to restrict their teaching to that genre, the provision of opportunities to work in any of the "core" areas of creative writing indicates the scope of the teaching available. Playwrighting rather than novel writing is included in our definition of "core" genres because it is unrealistic and unwarranted in most cases to expect a student to work on a novel in the usual one semester creative writing course but opportunities for playwrighting such as writing one-act plays could reasonably be included.

Question 4: Are there additional courses in creative writing? For example: TV, radio, film writing.

This question was designed to elicit information about unique courses in a school's program and clarify the scope of the creative writing curriculum. Also, with so much attention given today to film as a creative medium, lack of opportunities for film writing may be a serious omission.

Question 5: Are there any experimental or special programs which would affect students interested in creative writing? For example: work/study program, independent study.

The rationale for this question is so multifaceted, it would be difficult to outline it in such a brief introduction. The best brief statement we can give here is the following: aside from the intrinsic importance of carrying out self-directed projects in creative writing and the time and opportunity for practice in writing afforded by independent study (especially when independent study in creative writing is allowed), creative writing is crucially enriched by variation and extensiveness of life experience. Experimental programs, independent study, and work/study all potentially provide material and themes for creative writing and help spark the impulse to innovation which is intrinsic to creativity.

Question 6: Do you have writer instructors? Who are they?

There is good reason to believe that direct association with people seriously engaged in creative writing is especially important for stimulating young people to write. Also, it may be argued that only creative people can teach others to be creative. Since a simple yes or no answer to whether there were writers on the faculty would require further specific evaluation of the school's standards, actual faculty names were requested so that the reader could make his own judgments. Note: In the context of the whole questionnaire, it is clear that this question called for the names of professional writers on the faculty. However, only the word "writers" was used in order to give the school the widest latitude in answering.

Question 7: Is there contact with professional writers through lectures, artist series, etc.? Note if there is a "Writer in Residence" program.

The rationale for this question is related to that of Question 6. Some may argue that a "Writer in Residence" program is far more important than having creative writers directly on the salaried faculty and that occasional (often informal) contact with excellent writers can be more valuable than formal frequent contact with lesser ones. Without taking a position of this argument, we felt it was important to provide all the facts available. Also, we realize that the answers to this question and to Question 6 might be of interest to professional writers and publishing houses as well as students.

Question 8: Are there prizes or awards in creative writing?

Although locally awarded prizes often tend to be quite nominal, the presence of an award program for creative writing at a particular school may have an intangible incentive value far beyond the actual amount awarded. Awards and public announcements tend to convey the school's serious recognition of the importance of creative writing. It should be noted, of course, that personal encouragement of students by faculty and others may be of far greater importance than a specific school award or formal types of recognition but the quality of such encouragement is difficult to report or assess on a questionnaire survey.

Question 9: Are there individual conferences, workshops or seminars?

It seems inconceivable that such a personal and subjective discipline as creative writing could be taught without some opportunity for direct individual contact and feedback from peers and faculty but since our initial survey indicated that this was not always provided, this question is included.

Question 10: Are there non-curricular outlets for creative writing, e.g., campus radio station, literary magazine?

Some of our respondents suggested to us that the information provided by this question may be the most important of all for a real assessment of the status of creative writing at a particular school. Indeed, we are somewhat inclined to agree with this suggestion. The presence of non-curricular outlets providing opportunity for potentially unlimited active experience in creative writing is both a crucial means of developing and enlarging writing skills and interests as well as a reflection on the general attitude of both faculty and students toward literature in all its aspects: writing, performing, and appreciation.

The information gathered as a response to these ten questions appears in the tables contained in this guide. We have tried to present this information in the most readable form possible so that it may provide handy reference for anyone interested in a particular school or set of schools. Overall statistics, regional listings or information about special features such as Ph.D. programs in creative writing are not separately provided but all such information can be easily computed directly from the tables. Finally, we have refrained from any specific evaluative comments of our own with respect to any particular program. Evaluation considerations entered into the design of the questionnaire and, for the interested reader, we feel the data speaks for itself.

II. ORGANIZATION OF THE GUIDE:

The information collected has been organized into four main tables: TABLE I. Characteristics of Creative Writing Programs; TABLE II. Special Programs; TABLE III. Prizes and Awards; TABLE IV. Faculty Writers Specified. TABLE I lists all affirmative respondees alphabetically and summarizes all information collected. TABLES II, III, and IV are elaborations of TABLE I. TABLE II provides detailed information about asterisked responses in Column 8 (Special Programs) , as well as special responses indicated by an asterisk in Columns 2 (Type of Concentration) and 3(Type of Courses) on TABLE I. TABLES III and IV provide available detailed information about positive responses in Columns 6 (Prizes and Awards) and 5 (Faculty) respectively. The final unnumbered table is entitled "Schools offering no creative writing or non-responding". Since all schools on this list were sent a copy of the list itself for correction and none responded affirmatively, it may be assumed that none offer creative writing courses. The major table is TABLE I and the organization of all tables will be clarified by the following explication of TABLE I:

TABLE I. Characteristics of Creative Writing Programs

1. Name of School: Listings are arranged alphabetically under the first distinguishing word in their title, e.g., University of Missouri is found under titles beginning with "M" as is Manhattan College. In the case of large University complexes with several campuses, such as State University of New York, all campus listings follow the major title alphabetically, e.g., State University of New York at Albany is listed with "N"(New York) titles and is followed by State University of New York at Binghamton. Alphabetical listing follows the format of the Comparative Guide to American Colleges.

2. Type of Concentration: In this column, the academic status of creative writing at a particular college or university is specified. Possibilities are: undergraduate Major, Minor, Concentration; graduate degrees in creative writing, M.A., M.F.A., Ph.D. When special types of academic arrangements are set up such as allowing a creative writing project (novel, play, etc.) to be used for a graduate thesis, or when graduate courses in creative writing are offered without a degree in creative writing, or when there is another type of special academic status, this is indicated by an asterisk (*) in this column. The specific explanation of each asterisk is given next to the name of the school on TABLE II (Special Programs).

Majors or concentrations in Journalism are not included in this listing as majors or concentrations in creative writing, but if a major in "writing" includes a good deal of expository writing and allows creative writing as well, it is listed as a major in this column, with details given on TABLE II.

3. Type of Courses: Only undergraduate courses in creative writing are indicated. Although the category "creative writing course" may include different types of literary genre, we felt that a minimal basic offering was short story, verse, and playwrighting. This basic offering is indicated on the table by the term "Core", referring to a single "core" course providing opportunities for writing in any of these genre or several separate courses covering each one. We recognize that many schools do not provide academic outlets for writing in the three genres because of faculty limitations, time considerations, etc., but still feel that the comprehensive approach indicated by the term "core" should be specified. When only short story writing or playwrighting are offered, these are listed on the table by the symbols SS or Pl respectively. Verse is spelled out.

Although several schools indicated that courses in Radio and TV writing (sometimes listed as courses in "Broadcasting") were offered in departments other than English, e.g., Speech or Dramatic Arts Departments, these courses are still included in this column as general offerings of the college or university. Courses which were listed as providing opportunities for short fiction writing, prose writing, narrative writing, and advanced composition were classified SS in this column unless the focus was clearly expository, journalistic, non-fiction, or generally not oriented to creative writing at all. In some schools, coverage of the "core" genres and others is accomplished outside of formal courses particularly through independent study in creative writing and this is indicated by an asterisk in this column. Again, explanation of an asterisk is found next to the name of the school on TABLE II. When the symbol Undef. appears in this column, it means that the school indicated that it provided courses other than short story, verse, and playwrighting but did not specify which types.

4. Individual Contact: Yes answers in this column indicate that creative writing teaching formally includes seminars, tutorial, or individual conferences with faculty. It should be mentioned that the data in this column may not be completely accurate since several schools seemed to misinterpret the term "seminar" and "conference", thinking the question referred to special writing seminars or conferences with outside writers. In those cases where the misinterpretation was obvious, e.g., when schools indicated they provided independent study in creative writing but answered "no" to having individual conferences, etc., corrections were made, i.e., Yes appears in this column. Although it is unknown how many misinterpretations were missed, Yes answers are accurate and it seems clear that many of the schools actually answering "no" teach creative writing by the lecture method!

5. Contact with Professional Writers: Since practical experience with creative writing seems so important in the teaching of this skill and professional writers provide models for novices in the field, this column is broken down into three subdivisions, each subdivision providing information about the degree of contact with professional writers provided. Yes answers in the Faculty subheading indicate that professional creative writers are full or part-time members of the faculty of the designated school. Although all schools were asked to stipulate names of writers on the faculty (names stipulated appear on TABLE IV), some simply replied affirmatively without giving names. In such cases, it is difficult to evaluate the hiring policies of the school and the quality of faculty writers employed. Yes in the Lectures and Readings subheading indicates that some provision is made for talks, visits, or poetry readings by professional writers from outside the school. This may range from occasional single talks or visits to an extensive lecture series or workshop. In those cases where the lecture or workshop series is highly organized, has outstanding writers as participants and is an important part of the school's creative writing program, the name of the series is listed on TABLE II.

Although many schools listed names of regular members of their faculty as "Writers in Residence", affirmative answers in the Writers in Residence subheading on this table are indicated only when it is clear that outside writers are specifically invited for a designated period of time (one to two weeks up to a year), are not ordinary members of the faculty and may or may not have specific teaching duties. The practice of inviting a Writer in Residence to a college or university is based on a specific educational concept that students and regular faculty benefit from the availability of a professional writer on the campus. According to the concept, contacts with such a person should be informal as well as formal. Also, the practice is meant to facilitate the invited professional writer's own work; teaching commitments should be minimal or non-existent. Consequently, this subdivision is sharply distinguished from Faculty. Since there is, of necessity, a large turnover in specific "Writers in Residence" at any school, no separate listing of names is given in this guide.

6. Prizes and Awards: Yes answers indicate that a specific prize consisting of a cash award or special honor is, has been, or will be given by the school itself for achievement in creative writing (including an English award which recognizes creative writing). Although some schools listed publication of the student's writing in the school literary magazine, participation of students in national literary contests and encouragement by the faculty to publish writings in national publications, none of these are considered to be local prizes and awards and are not included.

Names and types of specific prizes and awards as well as amounts, where mentioned, are listed on TABLE III.

7. Special Outlets: This column specifies any extra-curricular outlets which allow practice and dissemination of creative writing or tend to stimulate such writing in some way. Wherever possible, the specific type of outlet available is stipulated. The key to the specification symbols is as follows: LM = college or nationally distributed literary magazine; LMs = college or nationally distributed literary magazines; RS = college radio station; RS(local) = locally available radio station facilities; Experimental Theater = college or local theater which produces student and faculty plays; Readings = poetry and prose readings by students and faculty; other listings in this column such as Writers' club are self-explanatory. In those cases where the word Yes appears without stipulation, no specific information about types of outlets was provided. Since both literary magazine and radio station were mentioned in the question asked on the questionnaire, it could be assumed that the school responding affirmatively has both of these. It should be mentioned that some schools stipulated a college newspaper which occasionally published poetry as an outlet but such answers are not reported as affirmatives since such an outlet is quite minimal.

8. Special Programs: Asterisk (*) listings in this column represent positive answers to the question, "Are there any experimental or special programs which would affect students interested in creative writing? For example: work/study, independent study." as well as any other special programs suggested by answers to all previous questions. The specific nature of each special program designated by asterisk is listed on TABLE II. Also, since many schools indicated having an independent study program, this is specified in this column by the symbol IS. Although detailed information about the various independent study programs is often not provided, the availability of time for independent study in any area the student chooses is an important direct and indirect aid and stimulus to creative writing. When indicated, independent study focussing on creative writing (c.w.) or allowing work in specific genres (Pl = playwrighting; poss. = possible) is also shown in this column. As will be seen on TABLE II, a variety of approaches to independent study is employed. Although some schools mentioned "directed independent study" or "tutorial", it is assumed that all independent study carried out in college is, to some extent, supervised. Many schools mentioned the January interim or inter-term period as an independent study time and since they were responding to a question pertaining to stimulation of creative writing, it is assumed that they meant that the student was not so overloaded with course reading during this period that he could not pursue truly independent writing or reading projects. In several cases, special study programs offering general courses were routinely or tentatively scheduled in the interim period and these are detailed on TABLE II where possible.

The entry Undef. (undefined) in this column indicates that the school simply answered "yes" to the question about special programs. Since the question referred to both independent study and work/study as examples, it is possible that such responses indicate that the school provides both of these programs. However, other undefined special programs may be offered.

Special summer or winter workshops in literature or writing are noted in this column and specified on TABLE II. When the workshop is clearly an integral part of the school's academic program, facts about the workshop are included in preceding column on this table, e.g., workshop faculty is included in Column 5 (Contact with Professional Writers).
